Huron native pens book about Vietnam War experiences

BY ROGER LARSEN

HURON — In the spring of 1967, a few days after Craig Tschetter graduated from Huron High School, he walked into a military recruiter's office at the post office and posed a question to a man sitting at a desk wearing a crisp white uniform.

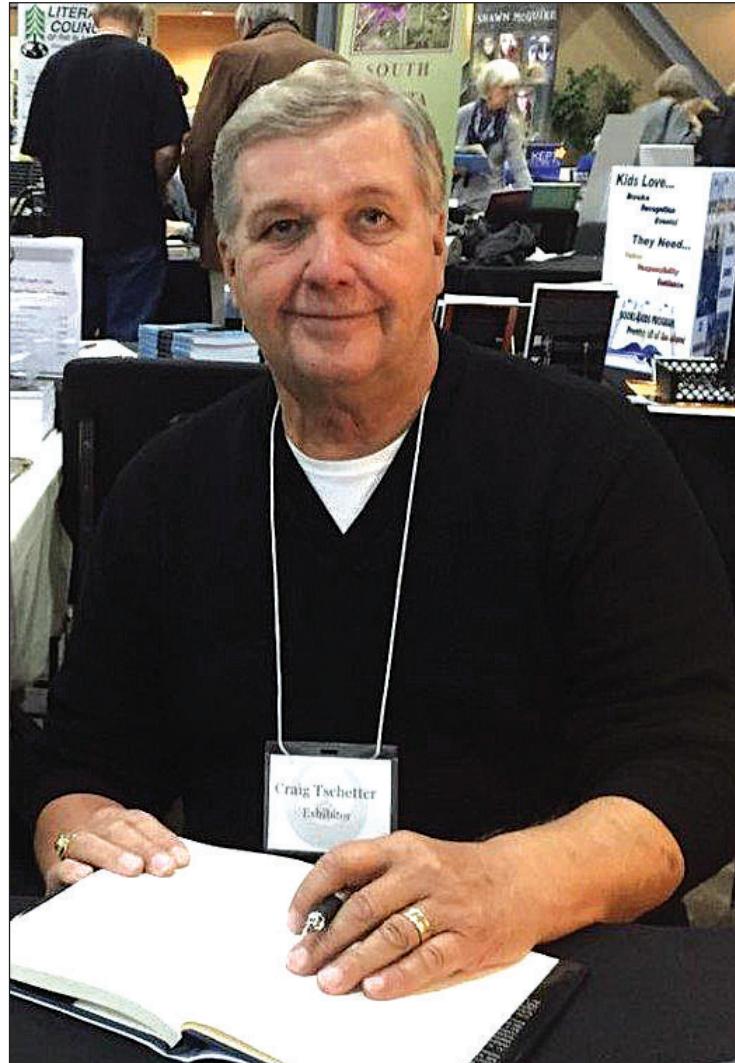

"What's the quickest way to get to Vietnam?" he asked the stunned soldier.

A minute later, Tschetter was handed the receiver by the Navy recruiter and was talking to someone at the United States Marine Corps in Sioux Falls.

Not only did he have his diploma, but Tschetter had also recently turned 18 and had decided it was time he made his own choices in life. His loving parents, Henry and Bobbie, were not the reason he wanted to leave home, at least not directly, he says.

Instead, it was his disagreement with the religious mandates he felt were forced on him as he was growing up.

But joining the military — a decision that led him to two tours in Vietnam at the height

Recalling his Vietnam encounter with a buddy

HURON — On the only day Roger Decker saw his friend and fellow Marine Craig Tschetter in Vietnam, at first glance he didn't know who he was.

"My recollection is that I was sitting on my bunk facing the back door of the hooch," Decker said, referring to his unit's living quarters.

"The door opened and in walked this rag-tag, dirty, tattered marine," he said. "He was looking for Roger Decker. I didn't recognize him."

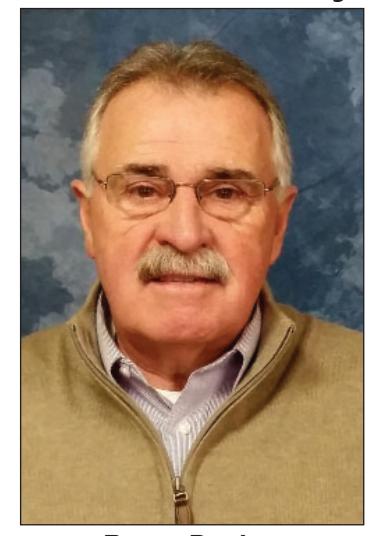

Tschetter had just graduated from Huron High School and Decker was at Huron College when they took advantage of a marine buddy program and enlisted at the same time so they could go to boot camp together.

But after that, their paths went different directions.

When they eventually got to Vietnam, Tschetter was assigned as a combat radio operator and Decker was a scout sniper in another regiment.

At the military recruiter's office, then in the post office in Huron, Tschetter signed up as soon as he turned 18. The recruiter told him about the buddy program, and Tschetter asked Decker to consider it.

big of a decision for the farm boy from Yale.

His mother had a cousin she called her brother. He had been a Marine in the South Pacific in World War II.

"I thought Loren was 10-foot tall and bullet proof," he said. "I really thought he was something. And, from that, and the fact I always liked army stuff, soldier stuff, I wanted to be a marine."

"I thought about it and I realized that Huron College was not the place that I wanted to be at that time," Decker said.

When he told his family of his enlistment, he said they

Hand Games and more for fun at the DOC

BY ANGELINA DELLA ROCCO
OF THE PLAINSMAN

HURON — At the Dakota Oyate Challenge 2018, held Thursday through Saturday at the Huron Event Center, participating schools also engaged in "Hand Games," among other activities.

Schools from Lower Brule Indian, Crazy Horse, Marty Indian, Omaha Nation, Flandreau Indian, Tiospaye Topa, Tiospa Zina and Takini came to Huron for the weekend to participate.

Hand Games consist of two teams, with between five and ten players on each team, while traditional music of drums and singing is enjoyed.

It is a traditional game, which involves each team hiding bones in order to earn sticks, while the other team attempts to guess where the bone is hidden.

Judges keep track of the games' progress throughout the day in order to award three teams the top places in the tournament.

"Hu Hu Icupi," which translates to "Bone Takers," was the name of the winning team from Tiospa Zina Tribal School.

Each team has a set of ten sticks, plus a kick stick and four bones — two marked and two bare. As players take turns hiding the marked bone, the other team assigns someone to guess whether the bone was hidden to the players' left or right.

In order to win, one of the teams had to play for and collect all 11 sticks, under the watchful eye of the head judge.

Respect is vital with Hand Games, in terms of playing along with the rules, and a mandatory hand shake between teams after games. These games are passed down in order to continue the traditions of the culture among the younger generations and beyond.

Another attraction at the Huron Event Center this weekend was the Archery tournament. Students from elementary to high school took their shots from different distances, some were experienced shooters and others were taking their first shots on the day.

This life changing skill encourages the students to practice precision, and is known as a "heeling sport," as nothing negative is said during practice.

Students were awarded first, second and third place prizes, in different divisions.

Other things to enjoy at the event center included booths and vendors set up in the halls with various handmade items and activities, including a cartoonist and more.
